I am deeply grateful to Mr Arthur Orama Nanthuru, who first introduced me to the work of Michel Foucault and post-structuralist literature. This encounter profoundly shaped my intellectual trajectory.

I thank the late Professor Charles Ngwenya for his enduring encouragement to write and publish. His advice motivated me to persevere even when I was on the verge of giving up.

My sincere thanks go to Professor Ann Skelton, who walked alongside me throughout my research journey with guidance, encouragement and support. She maintained an unwavering belief that my efforts would amount to something worthwhile.

I am especially grateful to Professor Catriona Macleod for her generous and incisive feedback on the first draft of this manuscript. Her input sharpened my arguments and deepened the theoretical richness of the book.

I thank Reverend Father John O'Donoghue of the Missionaries of Africa, who encouraged me to take the elective on sexuality. That decision marked a turning point in my life, opening new ways of thinking about sexuality, and helping me appreciate that sexuality is a gift from God.

I am indebted to the two anonymous peer reviewers of my original draft manuscript, and to Bridgit Davis, who copy-edited the manuscript. I am also grateful to Mtendere Njewa, who meticulously reviewed the references to ensure alignment with the PULP house style.

Finally, I thank Rhodes University for granting me the research associateship that enabled me to complete this book within the Critical Studies in Sexualities and Reproduction (CSSR) programme. That opportunity gave me the intellectual space and institutional support I needed to bring the project to completion.
